Total Counties per Species List

(Top five totals per county - 102 possible counties)

We mentioned last year that this list will likely see plenty of revisions and we predicted correctly. Many new birders shared impressive tallies of individual species, leading this list quickly into maturity. We've even had a number of requests for a regional list breakdown for next year. From looking at this data, it's obvious that a birder might specialize in recording a high count for an individual species. Using the Bell Curve statistical concept and ignoring the top list tally, one could look past the top lister and focus on the second tally. One might then be able to get a sense of which species would be considered a challenge to tick off. Breaking down species that the second-best lister recorded in 20 counties or less would appear to be species that are the toughest to find around the state. These account for 173 species, over 40% of the total state list. Perhaps this is a function of birders not visiting many counties or it's possible a number of species might be easier to find in selected state locations. Breaking the list down further, there were 80 species that the second-place listers had in five or less counties - species that should be considered as among the toughest to find in the state. About 30 of these are species that have only been seen a few times in state history. Examples of species in this breakdown that wouldn't be one of those 30 'super-vagrants,' but still considered statewide vagrants, would be King Eider, Cinnamon Teal, Rufous Hummingbird and Bohemian Waxwing. The number of species found by the second-best listers in 6-10 counties totaled 46. Examples within this boundary would be Black Scoter, Red-necked Phalarope, Varied Thrush, LeConte's Sparrow and Red Crossbill; all species that are considered to be rare sightings around the state or, perhaps, at the edge of vagrancy. That would leave 47 species in the 11-20 counties range, examples of which would be Tundra Swan, Black-crowned Night-Heron, White-rumped Sandpiper, Franklin's Gull, Whip-Poor-Will, Philadelphia Vireo and Mourning Warbler. These are species which would be uncommon statewide, but are fairly challenging to get in the vast majority of Illinois counties.

With the combination of continued submissions from active long-term birders along with another year for birders to target specific species, next year's TCPS list should be an amazing document.

One other interesting observation was the tallies of the top three listers for Black-capped and Carolina Chickadees did not change last year. What that suggests is the possibility that we may have reached the upper boundaries of what would be expected for each species, with Black-capped possible in two-thirds of the state counties and Carolinas in about 40% of Illinois counties.
